Runnebaum, 1984 In 1920 Hirose demonstrated the luteinising effect of placental tissue and one year later Evans and Long described luteinised ovaries in rats treated with hypophysial extracts In 1926 Zondek and Aschheim as well as Smith independently of each other showed that a gonad stimulating hormone was secreted by the adenohypophysis In 1927 Aschheim and Zondek found their Prolan in human pregnancy urine and the first reliable pregnancy test was available In the following years it could be demonstrated that the gonadotropic hormones from pituitary and from pregnancy urine were not of identical structure During the years 1931 1933 Fevold and coworkers prepared follicle stimulating hormone from sheep pituitaries which were free of other hormone activities Already in 1934 Collip found antihormones in animals treated with protein hormones from animals of another species. It could be shown that they were antibodies against these hormones and this was the future basis for the immunological era starting in 1960. The quantitative determination of gonadotropins has been performed over several decades by difficult bioassays and since 1960 immunological and later radioimmunological assays became available. Since that time a new field was opened for the studies of gonadotropins. During this time highly purified preparations of gonadotropins were available for research and clinical treatment. I recall the first successful attempt of inducing follicle growth and ovulation by Gemzell and coworkers 1958 as well as by Lunenfeld and Bettendorf at about the same time.
