

PHILOSOPHICAL WORDS & DEFINITIONS

Absolute in Latin means "loosened from", hence complete, unconditioned, independent – the opposite of relative. In general it is something, which is unconditioned and is variously taken as the identity of the knower and the known, or simply the whole.

Absolutism in political theory is the view that there are no restrictions on the rights and powers of the government.

Abstraction is the process by which we arrive at general words. A general word such as "man" is one that can be used generally, to refer to any man; unlike George Bush, which refers to a particular man.

Activism is the doctrine that action rather than theory is needed at some political juncture; an activist is therefore one who works to make change happen.

Actualism is sometimes known as ACTUAL IDEALISM. The term also applies in contemporary works to the view that only the actual world is real, with other possible worlds regarded as not themselves existing, but as wrongly thought to exist because modal idioms are useful instruments of thought about the real world.

Actuality is related to FORM & MATTER. So far as the matter, brass, is concerned there is the potentiality of a candlestick, a vase, a paperweight. The actuality is the candlestick, and so on. Matter without any form (prime matter) has no actual existence: to exist it must have a form. So, in a sense, actuality is prior to potentiality. Aristotle associates this with the doctrine that everything exists for the sake of an end.

Actualization means that for something to be real it must be actualized or made part of the actual world. In theology it may be important that GOD has no potential that is not actualized, since this would imply a change away from present perfection to something different and worse, or away from present imperfection to something better, neither of which is acceptable.

Aesthetics concerns perception. As ETHICS deals with questions of values in human actions, so aesthetics is concerned with values in works of art or in the appreciation of beauty in nature. Kant argues that aesthetic experience is a disinterested pleasure taken in some particular object: this pleasure is universally valid but not to be framed in general terms and therefore not a matter of the understanding or of reason, but of judgment.

Aestheticism holds that the appreciation of art and beauty is the highest aim of human life, and especially that the pursuit of such experience is not constrained by ordinary moral considerations. Art itself serves no ulterior moral or political purpose.

Agnostic one who neither believes nor disbelieves in the existence of God; one for whom the existence of God is a real, continuing, open question. A doubter of God's existence, but not as strong as an atheist.

Agnosticism in Greek means suitable for knowing. It is the view that our powers of knowing are bounded in certain regards, more particularly as to the ultimate reasons for things, and especially concerning the claims of religious dogma.

Akrasia ancient Greek, incontinence, weakness of will; a condition where one knows a thing is good, desires that thing, yet still does not embrace it.
