The Price That Binds Shangwen Yi, David J. Hardisty, Dale W. Griffin, Thomas Allard, 2023. This research examines the effectiveness of two common types of restricted price promotions: threshold promotions (conditional on spending more than a threshold amount) or a promotion trigger, and capped promotions (limited to a maximum dollar value or a cap trigger). Results show that threshold promotions are more effective than comparable capped promotions, even though capped promotions dominate in economic savings when the promotional trigger value (the critical spending level) is low, because consumers use the trigger value as an expectation-based reference point, leading to perceptions of greater fairness. However, when the trigger value is high, this effect reverses, and capped promotions are seen as fairer and consequently are more effective than threshold promotions. We observe these results in a series of six pre-registered studies, including a field study on TikTok in both price and charity promotion contexts and for separate and joint evaluation modes. We discuss the implications of our results for the effective management of price promotions.
