■ Space expert and university to make objects from lunar particles

Moon project dust the job!

BY ALAN THOMPSON

A FORMER Leicestershire engineer is collaborating with Loughborough University on a long-term project to make objects from lunar dust.

Engineering lecturer Dr Ross Friel, of the university, and entrepreneur Shaun Whitehead are working on the project which would avoid the need to carry heavy and costly payloads into space.

Mr Whitehead has been involved in several high-profile space missions, including the Beagle 2 mission to Mars and the BepiColombo mission to Mercury.

He said: "If mankind is going back to the Moon to stay, we need to find ways to sustainably live off the land, in the same way as the pioneers of the wild west did.

"This means extracting water and oxygen from the rocks and lunar soil, but it also means making physical objects using those very same rocks and soil."

LONG-TERM GOAL:
The Moon

He said: "When it comes to space travel, the cost of sending even a relatively small object to the Moon is huge.

"Instead of trying to send individual pieces into space how about we send the factory? 3D Printing technologies offer a potential solution to this lunar conundrum."

Dr Ross Friel, lecturer in additive manufacturing at the university's Wolfson School of Mechanical and Manufacturing Engineering, said: "We use the lasers to melt the soil simulacra, which represents crushed lunar rock.

"The aim is rather than sending all the equipment up there, to use what is available on the Moon to build a factory to make things, using 3D printing technology.

"As with most things to do with space technology, the timescale is huge, but the European Space Agency is talking about going to the Moon in about 2030 and we'd like to go with them."

Three PhD students are working with Dr Friel on the project, which could see a sort of cave built to house a spacecraft to protect it from lunar radiation.

Shaun, who now lives in North Yorkshire, said: "I'm excited Loughborough is involved. They have a large manufacturing group and liked it so much they set up a PhD project on the subject."

Jewellery that is 'out of this world'

USING the same material as US space agency NASA uses to simulate Moon dust, the engineers at Loughborough University are working to put this theory into practice.

Entrepreneur Shaun said: "Using a hi-tech laser-based 3D printer the scientists were able to use information directly from a computer model to produce, beautifully smooth, black and shiny "Moon pearls".

"These pearls were made layer by layer using the laser to melt the Moon dust into the correct shape each time.

"My company, Scoutek has worked with Anita Earl at Samuel Jewell, in

SPARKLING SCIENCE:
"Moon pearls" made from simulated lunar dust

Radiat, to turn the Moon pearls into a piece of jewellery.

"Anita set them in platinum, another very rare material that is found in abundance on the Moon.

"The result is a very valuable and stunning one-of-a-kind necklace that is out of this world."
