

New prospects in shallow depth electrical surveying for archaeological and pedological applications

A. Hesse*, A. Jolivet*, and A. Tabbagh*

ABSTRACT

Three different improvements in the galvanic method of shallow-depth electrical prospecting need to be made.

(1) A better definition of the electrode array(s) is needed in order to reduce the "apparent anisotropy" effect and increase the depth of investigation; the square array is one solution. (2) A resistivity meter that can make measurements very rapidly needs to be built. The rapid decrease of the induced electric field for small electrode distances makes such measurements possible. We propose a resistivity meter with an 8 ms measurement time. (3) The electrode-ground contact problem needs to be solved by using a resistivity meter that can endure high contact resistances. As an alternative solution, we also propose a new type of electrode: a liquid jet one. These improvements could make the resistivity method very attractive and competitive, and open large future developments for the method.

INTRODUCTION

There are large variations in the electrical resistivity of soils due to their granularity, porosity, and moisture. Electrical resistivity is one of the most interesting physical properties used for shallow geophysical surveying. The wide use of the resistivity survey method is further justified by the relatively low cost of the equipment needed.

In archaeological surveying, for example, four geophysical methods are currently being used: the direct current electric, electromagnetic, magnetic, and thermal methods. However 30 percent of the geophysical surveys undertaken in France during the last five years used only the resistivity method, and 12 percent used the resistivity method in association with another method. Competition in this field is often between the magnetic and the electrical methods, mainly because priority is given to the measuring speed. Magnetic surveying is not always the most suitable with regard to the contrasts existing in the ground and the nature of the features (or remains in the case of archaeology), but the fact that it can be used quickly makes it competitive with the electrical method.

We were particularly concerned with speed because of the ratio between the dimensions of the expected features and the survey area. Geophysical surveys usually describe one or a few anomalies produced by large geologic, mineralogical, or hydrological features. In contrast, shallow subsurface investigations try to find a large amount of small (one to a few cubic meters) remains in a relatively large space (one to several hectares). This is the usual situation in archaeology. The implication is that a large number (one to several thousand) of successive measurements are needed even for small maps. Thus the measuring time, as compared with the time taken to move from station to station, cannot be neglected, as it generally is for large electrode arrays. When we consider conducting the survey at industrial prices, time becomes very important. This is the case for archaeology as well as civil engineering studies and agronomical pedology.

A common practice in electrical surveying at a shallow depth is to plot on a map the apparent resistivity obtained by profiling at regular intervals with a collinear electrode array in the normal (A.M.N.B.) or dipole-dipole (A.B.M.N.) Wenner configuration. The map is completed with several electrical soundings. Positions of the soundings are picked to determine the depth, or stratigraphic position, of the main anomalies. This practice brings to light three types of difficulties.

(1) The apparent resistivity in a nonhomogeneous or non-layered medium depends largely on the orientation of the line of electrodes. This phenomenon produces a so-called "apparent anisotropy" which could be compensated (but only approximately) by making several readings at the same point with different orientations of the line of electrodes. This solution takes too much time and is expensive. For small arrays, where the electrodes are fixed on a frame moved by hand ($a \leq 1$ m), an inexpensive solution is to compensate globally for this effect by using a combination of orientations of the collinear electrode array along the profile. Such a combination is shown in Figure 1. An elongated body has virtually the same probability of detection no matter what its orientation is, even with only one electrode array per point. In contrast, for maps obtained with electrode arrays in line with the profiles, a distortion of the anomalies along the main directions of the measuring grid is unavoidable.
