

Preface

In accordance with NJL editorial policy to try to alternate general issues with special issues, this is a special issue on semantics. The contributions have not been specially commissioned, but have been selected from the contributions that have been sent to NJL as a result of the announcement that a special issue on semantics was forthcoming. The contributions that have been accepted are:

G. Fauconnier – Motion Mappings: An Example

P. Harder – Linguistic Meaning: Cognition, Interaction and the Real World

R. Hirsch – “Powerful Stuff” Discourse Processing: Social and Cognitive Aspects of Content Development in Conversation

T. Polzin & H. Rieser – Parsing with Situation Semantics

For reasons of the spatial limitations set by our publisher, not all of the contributions that have been accepted can be printed in the present issue. The paper by R. Hirsch will be printed in the next issue of NJL, which will appear in 1992.

Fauconnier deals with a problem in his theory of mental spaces. Harder discusses some quite general problems for the theory of meaning. Hirsch discusses the problems of a discourse-oriented semantics, while Polzin & Rieser present an approach to computer implementation of situation semantics.

The diversity of the papers, thus, quite well reflects the situation of semantics in Scandinavia, which can be characterized as being (i) internationally oriented and (ii) very diverse. Scandinavian semantics has a historical past, where linguists like Adolf Noreen, Gustav Stern, Otto Jespersen, Viggo Brøndahl and Louis Hjelmslev, as well as philosophers like Arne Naess, Dagfinn Føllesdal, Stig Kanger, Lennart Åqvist, Georg Henrik von Wright, Jaakko Hintikka and Erik Stenius have made contributions. There have also been a few contributions from other disciplines, e.g. Ragnar Rommetveit in psychology.

In spite of this, no really enduring schools of semantics have been established. The field is instead characterized by diversity, experimentation and eclecticism. Besides descriptive linguistic semantics and lexicography we can find truth conditional semantics, situation theory inspired semantics, game theoretical semantics and attempts to unify pragmatics and semantics.
