

reported in Schools, Communities, and the Arts: A Research Compendium, that "using arts processes to teach academic subjects results not only in improved understanding of content but in greatly improved self-regulatory behavior." Barry Oreck of ArtsConnection and Susan Baum from the College of New Rochelle observed integrated arts lessons in all major subject areas in fourteen New York City elementary and secondary public school classrooms. They found that "student behavior improved strikingly in such areas as taking risks, cooperating, solving problems, taking initiative for learning, and being prepared. Content-related achievement also rose."

Oreck notes "this answers our key question: whether skills from the arts transfer to other areas. But we also found that this transfer cannot occur unless teachers change their classroom's structure--their use of time, grouping, instructional strategies, active and participatory learning for all kids--to allow those skills and abilities to come out and be used."

The study also found that for students who struggle in schools with curriculum and instruction based primarily on verbal proficiency, arts processes are extremely powerful. "We saw huge changes for those with more kinesthetic, musical, and artistic tendencies," notes Oreck. His continuing research deals with developing arts assessments to evaluate learning in non-arts areas--using dance, for instance, to assess students' understanding of molecular bonding. "We have found that if you learn something through a theater game, you can still answer a straight test question," he says. "Does it work the other way around?"

What do the schools described above have in common? Their students are spending over 25% of their time in school studying the arts as separate subjects as well as integrated throughout the curriculum. It has been noted that through experiencing the arts they are developing the capacity for sound judgment, attention to purpose and ability to follow through on tasks, and the ability to consider differing viewpoints and defer judgment. They are exercising and developing mind, body, emotions,--and spirit!

The Human Brain

Let us take a moment to consider the mental equipment that students are using to make such dramatic academic achievement as described above. The human brain is the most complex system on earth, yet it is too often used in schools primarily as a simple device for storage and retrieval of information. It is now known from the research of such
