

The issue of sex is often avoided in or excluded from occupational therapy. This opinion piece argues that the exclusion of sex contradicts the holistic and client-centred arguments of occupational therapy and can lead clients to the adoption of precarious occupations in order to pursue their sexual needs. It offers an overview of some of the reasons for the exclusion of sex discourses from occupational therapy and calls for an appreciation of clients' sexual needs. By learning more about clients' experiences, occupational therapists can establish priorities towards shared outcomes and facilitate the maintenance, development and re-establishment of meaningful occupational lives.

Sex and Occupational Therapy: Contradictions or Contraindications?

Nick Pollard¹ and Dikaïos Sakellariou²

Introduction

Occupational therapy is often described as a holistic approach to working with individuals according to their occupational needs (for example, Blair and Hume 2002, Laver-Fawcett 2002). This opinion piece deals with the issue of sex or rather the silence around sex, and its ramifications for occupational therapy. Sex can be defined, for example, as 'feelings or behaviour connected with having sex or the desire to have sex' (Collins 1999, p757). It is a culturally shaped form of interaction that lies at the crossroads between desire, communication and occupation, rather than being just a physical or biologically determined act. Expressing one's sexuality is about the effective enactment of roles and engagement in occupation, be it dating, putting on make-up, dressing up or undressing, or sexual acts involving physical contact (Sakellariou and Simó Algado 2006a, 2006b).

Sex as a human occupation and as an occupational and health need receives only passing mention in occupational therapy literature. As Cooldrick (1998, 2005) has pointed out, the occupational therapy profession remains uncertain in its response to the issue of sex.

While this opinion piece was being written, a discussion was unfolding in the discussion forum of the College of Occupational Therapists' website (www.cot.org.uk) under the thread title Intercourse and Occupation. The views expressed were indicative of the mixed feelings of occupational therapists towards this area. Is occupational therapy's reluctance to deal with this area a contradiction of its professed holistic and client-centred processes, as suggested by Sakellariou and Simó Algado (2006a), or is involvement with sexual expression contraindicated on the grounds of illegitimacy? We argue that failure to deal with the issue of sex in therapy is a practice rooted in societal and professional structures and that it can compromise occupational therapy interactions. This opinion piece provides a brief overview of the reasons underlying the absence of discourses of sex from occupational therapy and considers avenues to address this occupational area, without overlooking issues of ethical responsibility.

Sex denied

It has been argued that occupational therapy lacks the expertise or else the capacity to explore sex as an occupational area in the face of competing priorities (Kielhofner, cited in Cooldrick 2005). Because of their professional position, and the power that comes with it, therapists define both the range of meanings ascribed to occupation and their legitimacy with regard to professional engagement. Thus, it is a matter of professional will, amongst other factors. The neat categories of activities of daily living and work and leisure occupations might appear comprehensive, but in fact reflect the sociocultural
