Community health worker (CHW) programs have existed for over 50 years across the world. However, only recently has research evidence documented their effectiveness. Research is still needed to identify issues related to implementation and sustainability of CHW programs. This article explores the role and challenges of U.S. Latino CHWs trained to deliver a comprehensive sexual and reproductive health educational intervention to Latino families. We conducted a semistructured interview with a purposive convenience sample of 19 CHWs. Findings suggest that CHWs occupy roles that go beyond those they were trained for. CHWs serve not only as educators but also as providers of social support, facilitators of access to resources, patient navigators, and civil rights advocates. Lack of clarity of the role of a CHW influenced perceptions of adequacy of compensation, training, and integration into the agency that trained them. Policy facilitating the standardization of the CHW occupational category and role expectations is imperative to ensure successful implementation and sustainability of U.S. CHW programs.

Latinos comprise 16.3% of the total U.S. population, and it is expected that by 2050 the Latino population will reach 132.6 million people

(Pew Hispanic Research Center, 2011; Centers for Disease Control and Prevention [CDC], 2012). Unfortunately, Latinos in the United States face considerable health disparities in multiple domains, particularly in sexual and reproductive health. For example, the rate of HIV infections among Latinos since 2006 is 2.5 times that of non-Hispanic Whites (CDC, 2009). In addition, Latinas are 2 times more likely to be diagnosed with other sexually transmitted infections such as chlamydia (CDC, 2009) and cervical cancer than non-Hispanic White women (American Cancer Society, 2009). Latinas are less likely to get screened for cervical cancer and receive follow-up treatment once cervical abnormalities are detected (American Cancer Society, 2009). Research also indicates that ethnic disparities exist in other sexual and reproductive health domains such as unintended pregnancies and incorrect use of contraceptives. Specifically, approximately 70% of Latinas aged 15 to 44 years surveyed in the 2006-2010 National Survey of Family Growth reported ever being pregnant and that 51% of such pregnancies were unintended. Participants also reported that half of these unintended pregnancies followed after incidents of
