

Psychotherapy for children and that for adults differs sharply because of four characteristics inherent in the child. First, there is a weak ego formation and consequent limited ability to deal with inner impulses and external demands. Second, there is narcissism with lack of ego control, impulsiveness and feelings of omnipotence. Third, the unconscious is near the surface because of incomplete superego development and lack of repressive forces of the ego. Fourth, identifications are in a fluid state.

For successful therapy there must be libidinal transference or identification transference with the therapist. However, in younger children, there may be substitution of the therapist for the parent love object rather than transference. Later in therapy there must be a process of transference in reverse from the therapist to the parent.

In discussing psychotherapy and psychotherapeutic guidance of parents, the author indicates that a major difficulty is that they do not have a separate and specific treatment aim for themselves. Their guilt and ego defenses lead them to blame the children for the difficulties.

There is a discussion of group psychotherapy and group guidance for parents. Also the principles of group psychotherapy for children are considered. The types of groups formed for therapy and the classification of children in the groups are described.

Slavson's "Child Psychotherapy" is a useful addition to any child psychotherapist's working library. The material is covered thoroughly and in orderly fashion. The author has a zeal for classification and titling, often inventing descriptive terms in profusion. At times the classifications seem to be a little artificial and overlapping. However, the general effect is one of clarification and logical presentation.

FRANK S. CAPRIO: The Sexually Adequate Male. The Citadel Press, New York, 1952, 210 pp., $3.00.

The author has assembled in this new volume many of the facts about sexual inadequacy in the male, which he drew from his own wide knowledge as a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst and also from much that he and others have written about this same problem. In spite of shortcomings, the book is a useful addition to the literature on the subject. It is readily understandable and equally valuable to the professional as well as the lay reader.

Caprio's approach to the subject is predominantly psychoanalytic. Biological and pathological data are not neglected but some of the respective statements are open to question and others are not too clear. There is, for instance, no evidence that the prostate gland has an internal secretion as the author assumes. (P. 34.) To say that an operation has been called "Monkey Glands" is semantically and otherwise faulty. The reference is to the transplanting of monkey glands for the purpose of rejuvenation as ad-
