Shadow and Sound James T. Siegel, 1979 Shadow and Sound James Siegel, 1978-12-01 Atjeh was a kingdom in northern Sumatra which had a long history of rebellion and unrest As a Mulim Sultanate from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century Atjeh engaged in internal political struggle Since the nineteenth century Atjeh has been under Dutch Japanese or Indonesian control domination to which the Atjeh never passively yielded In Shadow and Sound James Siegel argues that the Atjehnese view of history as expressed in the language of their epic poetry is based not on the fixing of historical fact but on a flow of words that is actually immune to the past Siegel traces the Atjehnese treatment of history through two epics and a folktale In his interpretation he goes beyond the idea tht texts such as these are semi accurate historical documents to show tht tempo rhythm rhyme and melody replace the significance of the content Furthermore he uncovers which Atjehnese frameworks native genres ranging from dream interpretation to conventions of braggadocio illuminate their own sense of history Siegel first translates one of the important remaining epics on a historical topic the Hikajat Potjoet Moehamat and provides an analysis based on the narratve prosodic structure and his observation of the recitation of epics He then translates and analyzes two other pieces a tale entitled Si Meuseukin s Wedding and another epic the last popular one Hikajat Prang Sabil Finally he indicates how a similar treatment of history continues in present day Atjeh The analyses demonstrate that in the context of centuries of violence and disruption the Atjehnese have maintained an ability to speak of the past in such ways that it is turned into triumph not by dwelling on heroic victories but by controlling language Siegel s way of looking at the relationship between history and literature will be valuable not only in anthropology but in literary history and comparative studies in literature and politics as well Telling Lives, Telling History Susan
