

The Churchgoers

Patricia U. Bonomi

Recent estimates suggest that a majority of adults in the eighteenth-century colonies were regular church attenders. Though the worship of God was no doubt the primary motive for churchgoing, eighteenth-century worshipers, like those of today, found that church attendance served a number of non-spiritual needs. The quest for community, long recognized as an incentive for churchgoing, must have operated with particular force among inhabitants of the dispersed farming society of early America. Churches in both country and town were vital centers of community life, as government proclamations were broadcast from the pulpit and news of prices and politics were exchanged in the churchyard. In a society formed from the uprooted communities of the Old World, moreover, the church congregation served as a primary agency by which immigrants recovered something of what they had left behind. Family tradition was another strong stimulus to churchgoing. Pious colonial parents promoted the religious education of their children and instilled in them habits of regular church attendance. In some congregations the founding elders and their offspring gained such firm control over the church that newcomers or persons not descended from "Godly parents" were made to feel unwelcome. Such "tribalism" apparently characterized the early Puritan churches, and a similar turning inward has been detected among the Quakers of Pennsylvania.

Inhabitants living on the geographic periphery of colonial parishes found their churchgoing practices being shaped by circumstances over which they had little control. As towns expanded, owing to natural increase and in-migration, a rising proportion of the outlanders lost touch with the central church. Distance and bad weather made travel to Sabbath services so hazardous that outlying hamlets frequently were granted "winter privileges," or the right to conduct their own services under lay direction. As peripheral districts gained population additional parishes were formed, and soon the former outlanders emerged as pillars of newly gathered churches.

The factors just noted also were significant determinants of the degree of church adherence, that is, of whether individuals became communicants, half-way members, regular attenders, pew holders, irregular attenders, or
