INTRODUCTION

It is considered unfashionable in many quarters to announce oneself as a librarian. Yet librarians have produced one of the most remarkable feats of international cooperation in the last 50 years, which has gone unheralded and unannounced, but whose characteristics should be informing the development of standards for the Internet and the World Wide Web. Indeed so great is that success that we take it absolutely for granted. Broadly speaking it is possible to identify any recent published work from anywhere in the world and whether or not one has identified a location for the item to borrow it or a facsimile of it either free or for a very small sum. This article will reflect on that success and on its relevance to the development of electronic information, where a dangerous complacency assumes that our skills are so minor and/or our influence so limited that we must cede the field to larger players. It will argue that our skills are in fact entirely appropriate to developing the scholarly infrastructure which is so glaringly missing from the Internet and the Web. As a convenience, the building blocks will be split into two groups, reflecting IFLA's original core programmes of Universal Bibliographic Control (UBC) and Universal Availability of Publications (UAP). This model is used because it is through international bodies such as IFLA that this success has been sponsored and achieved[1].

UNIVERSAL BIBLIOGRAPHIC CONTROL

Throughout the first half of the 20th century the dream of universal bibliographic control was largely embodied in those monumental multivolume works of erudition, the Library of Congress Catalogue and the British Museum (later British Library) Catalogue. Although they filled great banks of shelves in their dress of green and blue, no research library was (or is) complete without them. But they were never easy to use and followed sets of independent – one hesitates to say arbitrary – rules devised by great
