

Mary Weatherford, First Death, 1991, acrylic, fabric, and oil on canvas, 78 x 107".
From "Plastic Fantastic Lover (Object A)"

that Cookie is a young orangutan who sometimes dresses as a boy, sometimes as a girl. In Cookier, she appears youthful, surprised, and excited, wearing a white dress-collared and a slip or skirt that only comes up to her nipples. Clutching a wet spear of asparagus, her eyes wide and focused on something in the distance, it's as though she sees herself being seen—perhaps by the eyes of God. Her hair and the asparagus stalk are blown back as if a surprise wind had come up, and a halo of white radiates off both the asparagus stalk and Cookie's head. The presence of God and the use of air currents—frequently objects such as collar cups, stuffed green olives, pencils, cigarette butts, and the occasional fried egg take flight—are recurrent themes for Wilson. Beads of sweat often drip from things, and, throughout a passion for depicting the tactile prelapsar, in several of the paintings one finds grape jelly that is palpably sticky to the eye.

These paintings are Gothic and grotesque in the purest of Southern senses, but there is more to it than that. Wilson specializes in subtle and surprising juxtapositions. Within each work he taps into centuries of painterly concern— nods to DaVinci, Bosch, and Ingres are combined with details from his own breakfast that very morning and perhaps a little gossip about the people who live next door. In part, it is the way in which time is compressed and compounded that gives Wilson's work an eerie otherworldliness that simultaneously remains somehow familiar (many of the works are timed as well as dated). Throughout, Wilson's execution is seamless, because he never stints on technique, his work avoids appearing as simply a compendium of references and instead the paintings offer something entirely unique. The world of Donald Koller Wilson is exciting and eccentric, a never-seen land where anything can and will happen.

"PLASTIC FANTASTIC LOVER (OBJECT A)"

WAREHOUSE

Framed by its vaguely evocative, post-psychedelic/Lucanian title, this convincingly installed group show whippers the promise of a manifesto never fully articulated. The work of 21 artists, "all of whom happen to be women," packs the gallery—slouching in corners, sprawling on the floor, dangling from the ceiling. Formally many of the pieces attest to Eva Hesse's (and, less directly, Andy Warhol's) continuing influence, most bluntly apparent in Asta Gritling's Discoed, 1991, an anthropomorphic coiled mass of silicon and woodshavings. Many of these artists borrow Hesse's repudiation of glacial formalism, her notions of "wild space," and her use of entropy and chaos to invest the absurd or the object with uncanny expressiveness. Attending to the strategic failings of much of the commodity-fetish work of the late '80s, this exhibition injects newly resurrected Conceptualism and Minimalism with the uncanny and the absurd. Most resonant in this respect are Jessica Stockholder's accumulation of plywood, carpets, and electrical cord, and Karen Kilimnick's pathetic, disaffected videos (with hand-drawn boxcover and how) Emma Peel and Nive and Introducing Tabitha (both 1991).

As with any group exhibition, imposed conceptual frameworks often crumble under scrutiny; wisely, "Plastic Fantastic Lover" attempts to trace the loose contours of a zeitgeist rather than to define a coherent polemic. Refusing the role of master narrator, curator Catherine Lin privileges ellipsis over omniscience in her catalogue essay. Martin Scorsese's section of New York Stories, 1989, and Charles Vidor's Gilda, 1946, as well as David's Dark of the Moon, 1784 (curiously read by way of shirysomething), feel her second take on feminist theories of the eponymous "gaze," that elusive agent of desire. Lin's deliberately eclectic text, while provocative, merely alludes to its Lucanian referent, swinging sloppy with her presumption of gender as fixed identity and her (heterocentric) assertion that "what makes us look across the divide between men and women is love." (Surely the continuing redefinition of sexual politics and identities has complicated reductive formulations of object choice.) Invoking the forces of the object and the powers of subjectivity, Lin locates these works' refusal to translate theoretical or political concerns within an authentic radicality she defines as "rigorous formalism combined with psychological authenticity." Sketchily defined in the essay, however, Lin's claims for authentic radicality are ironically infected with a touch of reinvented Greenbergian formalism.

Both Cathy de Monchaux's Sage, 1991 (nine erotically charged clamped pouches with and without alabaster balls), and Rachel Lachowicz's cast lipstick Devotion, 1991 (red breasts crowning an architectural sconce), recall the psychic underflow of Meret Oppenheim's far-lined teacup (iconomastic Surrealist icon and witty lesbian entendre), yet neither possesses the laconic poetry and uncanny intensity of Oppenheim's domestic intervention.

Locked into the constraints of a revisionist formalism or resurrected "style," many of these works lack the self-critique required to escape familiar historical tropes; Sylvia Fleury's accumulation of shopping bags, Spillbound, 1991, or Angela Bulloch's installation of beluga beacons, Blue Four, 1991, are particularly flat in this regard. Other works, notably Beverly Sussner's sumptuous Four People Forever Buried, 1991, or Rosa Pondick's hanging mass of teeth and shoes, entitled Chorus, 1991, appear stranded within the more challenging context of this show, their sloppy theatricality striking a claying note.

The best works in this exploratory exhibition point to a wary, disfranchised subjectivity, a cultural approach weary of media irony and searching for a foothold in the fissure between Modernist formal purity and post-Modernist pastiche. Recognizing the limitations of a feminism that defines itself solely in relation to language, "Plastic Fantastic Lover" embraces clutter and excess en route to an indirect and complicated articulation of the "personal as political."
