Abstract: The study was undertaken to study the personality characteristics of bright and dull adolescents of class 10th students belonging to Batamaloo zone of District Srinagar (Kashmir). The sample of the study comprised of 100 bright and 100 dull adolescents. These bright and dull adolescents had been identified through Raven's Advanced Progressive Matrices (IQ test). The data was collected by employing Cattell's 14 HSPQ to all 100 bright and dull adolescents. For the analysis of data t-test was used. Line Graph was plotted to make the results transparent. The results show that the two groups (bright and dull adolescents) differ significantly on the factors B,D,F and G of HSPQ which reveal that bright adolescents are more intelligent, excitable, demanding, overactive, enthusiastic, happy-go-lucky, conscientious, persistent, moralistic and have stronger super ego strength while as dull adolescents are less intelligent, undemonstrative, in active, taciturn, disregard rules, expedient and have weaker superego strength. However no significant difference was found on factors A,C,E,H,I,J,O,Q2,Q3,Q4.

Introduction

Perhaps the most difficult problem of classroom organization is dealing with different knowledge skills, learning rate and motivation. This problem requires teachers to provide appropriate levels of instruction. Teaching a class of thirty students or even a class of ten is fundamentally different from one-to-one tutoring because of inevitability of student-to-student differences that affect the success of instruction. Teachers can always be sure that if they teach one lesson to the whole class, some students will learn the material more quickly than others. In fact some students may not learn the lesson at all because they lack important pre-requisite skills or are not given adequate time (because to give them enough time would waste too much time of those students who learn rapidly. Actually, in many school situations the dull are simply unable to do what is assigned, even with extra time, for their ceiling of ability is below the demands made on them. Yet despite these great differences, the bright and dull sit side by side in many classrooms, all assigned the same lesson at the same time with the same time limits. The teacher tends to be impatient with dull and the classmates finding them confused and dumb do not associate them in their play-groups and group activities. At home their parents and bright brothers and sisters either make too many sacrifices for these unfortunate slow-learners thus making them dependent, diffident and burdensome or reject them as being no-goods thus rendering them frustrated and helpless. Hence slow-learners or dull are in a difficulty. The wastage and stagnation thus caused by constant dropouts and failures are a serious loss to the nation. While as the bright child's mentality and his capacity for learning are the basis of all his future achievement including that in the matters of his adjustment to life situations. Besides, the bright children are possibly the nation's leadership potential which must be reared well to keep the wheels of democracy moving. Again it is these children who may lead the country's development in various fields like industry, science, art and literature. But throwing these children on their own resources is not without its adverse consequences. Being fast, they are often left with surplus time which must be occupied to their benefit. The special abilities and aptitudes of these children must be determined; and they should be advised to make wise curricular choices depending upon their aptitudes. So with both dull and bright, parents must be brought into the picture to assure an understanding at home of what the school is trying to do and a continuity between expectations at school and at home. Jensen (1980) states that students with IQ 80 to 90 who are traditionally labeled 'dull normal' are generally slower to 'catch on' to whatever is being taught if it involves symbolic, abstract or conceptual subject matter. In the early grades in school they most often have problems in reading and arithmetic and are labeled 'slow learners'. But it is really not that they learn so slowly as that they lag behind in developmental readiness to grasp the concepts that are within easy reach of the majority of their age mates. So they may be called
