Summary: The impact of the worldwide AIDS epidemic on persons aged 50 years or older has received relatively little consideration except in the United States, where interest has focused almost exclusively on older persons living with AIDS or at risk for infection. The place of older persons in the epidemic deserves international attention because their lives are being significantly affected in a variety of ways. Because most of the epidemic occurs in the developing regions of the world, especially in Africa and Asia, efforts to understand and deal with the concerns of older persons in relation to AIDS in those settings need expansion. Although older persons represent a non-negligible minority of the reported global caseload, a far larger number of older persons are affected through the illness and death of their adult children and younger generation relatives who contract AIDS. From a global perspective, a broader concern encompassing those who are affected through the infection of others rather than a narrow concern with those who are at risk or infected themselves is called for if the needs of the large majority of older persons adversely affected by the epidemic are to be addressed. Key Words: HIV/AIDS—Older persons—Parental caregiving—Thailand—Family.

As most of the other articles in this issue attest, increasing awareness exists that older persons in the United States also are at risk for HIV/AIDS and that their circumstances and needs may differ from those younger persons on whom most research and intervention programs typically focus. Our purpose is to provide a global perspective on the overall impact of the AIDS epidemic on older persons with particular attention to the developing world, especially Asia and Africa. We argue that, globally, the greatest impact of AIDS on older persons occurs not on older persons who are HIV infected but rather on those who are affected by others, particularly their adult children and younger generation relatives, who become ill and die of AIDS.

That the limited attention to how the HIV/AIDS pandemic affects older persons has focused mainly on the United States rather than globally is unfortunate for several reasons. First, most older persons either who are infected themselves or who are affected through the infection of others overwhelmingly are outside the United States, a country that accounted for less than 2.5% of the 36 million persons living with HIV/AIDS at the end of 2000 (1). In contrast, 70% of those infected are in sub-Saharan Africa, and 16% are in South and Southeast Asia (2). Second, the extent and nature of the impact on older persons likely differ in areas of the world where the epidemic is most severe and where the social, cultural, economic, and political contexts are different. Finally, most research in the United States focuses on older persons who are either themselves infected or at high risk of infection and ignores the broader range of consequences that are relevant for understanding how the epidemic affects older persons worldwide.

CONTRASTING EPIDEMIOLOGIC AND SOCIAL SETTINGS

Major differences among the AIDS epidemics around the world have implications for the impact on older persons. Prevalence levels are by far the highest in sub-Saharan Africa. Overall adult prevalence (for those aged
