ABSTRACT

In this multidisciplinary study, we offer an integrative view on the coherence of narratives regarding close relationships. We show how coherence, as conceptualized by attachment researchers, is manifested in discursive syntactic structures, as conceptualized by linguists. To illustrate this correspondence, we use narratives of six mothers about their adolescent child and their relationship. Narratives were elicited with the widely used Five Minute Speech Sample (FMSS) procedure and were coded according to the FMSS-coherence manual, tapping their clarity, consistency, and multidimensionality. In addition, the syntactic constructions employed by mothers were analyzed. FMSS were segmented into Clause Packages (CPs). Within CPs, overt syntactic markers, such as 'because,' as well as unmarked thematic and pragmatic relations, such as new vs. given information, were categorized as reflecting different levels of integration between clauses. As we demonstrate, mothers whose narratives were rated as more coherent employed more integrated CPs. We conclude by discussing the multi-layered nature of coherence. We consider how a multidisciplinary approach to coherence can enrich the understanding of personal narratives and open a new direction for research of close relationships as well as inform functional analyses of the linguistic expression of coherence.

1. Introduction

The coherence of narratives about family and other close relationships is a central construct, particularly in research guided by attachment theory (Fiese & Spagola, 2005). Numerous studies show that it predicts behavior in close relationships and wellbeing (e.g., Hesse, 2008; Oppenheim, 2006). Coherence taps the conceptual integration of the narrative, namely its clarity, consistency, multidimensionality, and believability (Main et al., 2003), which presumably reflect the extent to which internal representations (i.e., thoughts, feelings, and expectations) regarding the relationships are integrated. The current work joins efforts made by attachment researchers to reveal elements underlying coherence. It aims to complement previous studies, which focused on word-counts (e.g., Borelli et al., 2012) and prosody (e.g., Spinelli et al., 2022), by shedding light on how coherence is manifested in the syntactic structure of the narrative. The study focuses on the under-explored networked structure of propositions (Kintsch, 1995; Trabasso et al., 1989), based on the view that syntactic organization is incrementally constructed and is not consciously adjusted during online production (Auer, 2009; Bock & Kroch, 1989). As such, linguists suggest it may constitute a gateway to the mind (Wierzbicka, 1978). Its correspondence to coherence may enrich our understanding of the processes and devices by which the organization of internal representations is externalized when narrating about close relationships. Such investigation may also inform linguistic research, by showing that individual differences in the use of syntactic structures are affected by emotional processes and in particular by the qualities of close relationships.

Attachment theory suggests individuals construct representations regarding their close relationships, the self and the partners in these relationships. Coherence is thought to tap the extent to which these representations are integrated (Bowlby, 1969/1982; Hesse, 2008). Some individuals form multifaceted representations with positive and negative attributions, thoughts and feelings that are well-integrated and flexibly updated based on real-life interactions (Bowlby, 1969/1982; Bretherton et al., 1989). When interviewed about the relationship, these individuals are likely to narrate in a coherent manner. They are likely to portray the relationship in a focused, clear, multidimensional and consistent way that is supported with examples from everyday life
