legislation and politics      Schweizerische landwirtschaftliche Forschung ,1988      Towards a Second Green Revolution G.B. Marini-Bettòlo,2012-12-02 Genetic research in some fundamental crops together with the use of chemicals as pesticides and fertilizers opened the way in the 1950s and 1960s to great changes in methodology in agriculture with astonishing results in the tropics This change became known as the Green Revolution a truly great revolution in methods and materials which when applied with intelligence made possible in a few years the achievement of complete sufficiency in cereals production in South and South East Asia Mexico and South America After 20 years of continuous success aspects of the Green Revolution need to be rediscussed in the light of new findings and possibilities offered by scientific and technological progress and negative side effects on environment and health These papers examine the present state of agriculture and indicate the way forward for its development especially in the tropics and in particular Africa and South America The need for more research is stressed priorities in the application of this research are discussed such as the economic aspects of any new system to be adopted and the need to respect the ecological equilibria of different environments and the balance of energy input output in a given agrosystem      Microbiology Abstracts ,1985      Integrated Pest Management A. J. Burn,T. H. Coaker,Paul C. Jepson,1987 FROM THE PREFACE The idea of Integrated Pest Management IPM is not a new one and since the term was first coined it has come to achieve a range of different meanings In its simplest form it is accepted as being a control strategy in which a variety of biological chemical and cultural control measures are combined to give stable long term pest control In its recent renaissance IPM has more often been taken to describe more biologically oriented pest control strategies that have arisen following problems with purely chemical control It is the purpose of the first six chapters of this book to consider fundamental principles for IPM development and to outline current research progress and future research needs in the light of technological developments and agricultural requirements The final seven chapters of the book deal with the practical aspects of IPM implementation The range of crop types considered represent the diversity of crop production and storage systems in Western Europe with different ecological backgrounds against which IPM might operate and within which IPM has developed to differing extents      Tagungsbericht ,1986
