Examines aspects of tourism development as reflected by articles published in: Annals of Tourism Research, Tourism Management and Travel and Tourism Analyst during 1995 (sustainable tourism, transport, new products and the future of tourism) and during the six-year period from 1989-1994 (social trends in tourism, tourism planning and the airline industry).

Introduction

The first part of this article reviews the themes and their related subthemes as reflected in the articles published during 1995 in Annals of Tourism Research, Tourism Management and Travel and Tourism Analyst. The themes are reviewed both through tabular and written descriptions. In the second part the same journals are analysed but the summary spans the six-year period from 1989 to 1994. At the end of the article two thematic diagrams relating to 1989-1994 and 1995 respectively are given. These diagrams provide an overview of the main themes, subthemes and proposed actions.

A content analysis of the selected publications revealed a number of themes and the four elaborated here are:

1. sustainable tourism;
2. transport;
3. new products;
4. future of tourism.

Theme 1: sustainable tourism

The main issue arising from Table I is the need to consider sustainability during the early phases of tourism development. Developing a product that sits in harmony with the local environment is addressed in research conducted in Fiji by Ayala[1]. Over the last ten years Fiji has seen a dramatic rise in the number of tourists visiting, from up-market segments right through to the back-packer undertaking a round-the-world trip. Fiji has many differing attractions on offer, and if it is to remain successful, it needs to be integrated with a high-quality product that both considers and fits the local environment. Many Fijians see tourism as a quick way to earn a substantial living, and thus follow the same precedent that was set by Bali some years ago. Ayala therefore concludes that sustainability needs to evolve through effective planning, where guidelines are set on the breadth and depth of development. Further, locals need to be educated about sustainability in the hope of training people to preserve the product that actually offers them a living.

Research conducted by Harrison[2] and Garcia-Ramon[3] looks at two different countries in their search for a prolonged tourism life cycle. First, Harrison considers Africa, and in particular Swaziland, and reviews progress in the context of life cycles. The author notes that this particular nation underwent rapid growth during the British colonial period but has since declined rapidly. A rejuvenated Swaziland has the potential to develop an excellent tourism product that not only uses the skills of the local people but also fits the local environment. Perhaps by reflecting on examples of badly planned development in Kenya and Tanzania, Swaziland has an opportunity to learn from these and to provide the "perfect destination". Second, Garcia-Ramon[3] looks at Spain, noting that over the past few years Spain has tried desperately to offer products that support the local community. Focusing away from the coastal regions, Garcia-Ramon notes that the rural interior needs to be developed to provide the "ideal" rural tourism product that allows visitors to stay with the local people, so breaking down local-tourist resentment.

Table I reflects a common strand of thinking across the three journals, namely a concern for sustainability. This can be achieved by educating and training people involved in tourism[4] and by the actions of governments and businesses alike in sponsoring initiatives that address the relationship between tourism and the environment[5].

Theme 2: transport

In reviewing the range of articles published across the tourism spectrum (Table II), transportation is notably well presented and especially the activities of airline operators. It is interesting to observe that writers have
