Will David Weissman, 2020-04-01 There is agency in all we do thinking doing or making We invent a tune play or use it to celebrate an occasion Or we make a conceptual leap and ask more abstract questions about the conditions for agency They include autonomy and self appraisal each contested by arguments immersing us in circumstances we don t control But can it be true we that have no personal responsibility for all we think and do Agency Moral Identity and Free Will proposes that deliberation choice and free will emerged within the evolutionary history of animals with a physical advantage organisms having cell walls or exoskeletons had an internal space within which to protect themselves from external threats or encounters This defense was both structural and active such organisms could ignore intrusions or inhibit risky behavior Their capacities evolved with time inhibition became the power to deliberate and choose the manner of one s responses Hence the ability of humans and some other animals to determine their reactions to problematic situations or to information that alters values and choices This is free will as a material power not as the conclusion to a conceptual argument Having it makes us morally responsible for much we do It prefigures moral identity Closely argued but plainly written Agency Moral Identity and Free Will speaks for autonomy and responsibility when both are eclipsed by ideas that embed us in history or tradition Our sense of moral choice and freedom is accurate We are not altogether the creatures of our circumstances Urban
