ROBERT LAPORTE, JR. : Power and Privilege: Influence and Decision-making in Pakistan, Vikas Publishing House, New Delhi, 1976, xii, 225p. Rs. 50.

SIX years ago when Zulfikar Ali Bhutto emerged as the saviour of what remained of Pakistan, few could have forecast the kind of political crisis in which that country finds itself today, thanks largely to Bhutto himself. But perspicacious observers of the Pakistan scene, like the author of this exceedingly well-written and thoroughly documented analytical study (first published by the University of California Press, California) were able to see that the country was passing through a process in which "the civilian population led by Bhutto attempts to work out some kind of modus operandi with the military."

Elites are power holders in a society; the type of power may be economic, political or social. In Pakistan, as in many other countries, to possess political power is to hold power in society. But because of the circumstances in which Pakistan came into being as a sovereign state—largely as a byproduct of the struggle for political independence led by the Indian National Congress—the political roots of power had soon dried up, landing the country in a series of crises. The social character of the leaders of the freedom movement in India might not have been far different from that of the Quaid-e-Azam, M. Jinnah, and his colleagues who were at the helm of affairs in Pakistan at its birth. But the Indian National Congress had a mass political base which the Muslim League in Pakistan (or for that matter in India) lacked. It was essentially a lobby—like pro-Moscow Communist parties in many countries—which was effective as long as the threat of "Hindu domination," perceived or real, lasted.

In 1962, the present reviewer, as a correspondent in Pakistan, had a very long and interesting meeting with Chaudhri Mohammed Ali, a former civil servant who had risen to be the Prime Minister of that country. He was of the firm opinion that if the Muslim League had a mass base, like the Indian National Congress, the parliamentary system would not have given way so easily to a "saviour" like Field Marshal Ayub Khan. For a bureaucrat and that, too, a Muslim, he was all praise for the role of the Indian National Congress and some of its leaders like Sardar Patel. By the same token, if Ayub Khan had been able to institutionalize his regime, Pakistan would have been spared the leadership of a politician like Bhutto.

Study of decision-making processes in countries like Pakistan or for that matter India is no easy task. Hard facts are difficult to come by. Personalities overwhelm issue-oriented politics. Above all, the tendency is to shroud everything in secrecy. Against this background, Prof. Laporte has done a commendable job and has produced a first-of-its-kind study of Pakistan developments practically since 1947. His unavoidable dependence on interviews with American residents in Pakistan as a source material may
