CHAPTER

7. SCOPE AND ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURE OF A PROJECT

- 7.1 Consider a joint venture between the Business School and the School of Medicine aimed at the development of a new degree program in the management of health services. Because both participants are at the same level in the university hierarchy, it makes sense to have two project coordinators, one from each school. As is common in education, both schools have a functional structure.

For project likes this, the organizational structure should be a weak matrix in which the two coordinators call on resources (e.g., professors, laboratories) from the different functional areas in their corresponding school to develop the new program. Both will be equally responsible for the definition of the curriculum, the assessment of needs, the integration of the two disciplines, the acquisition of new resources, and the implementation of the program.

7.2 A New Solar Heater Project

Assuming that the project is performed by a functional organization with a strong engineering department, the project manager will be an engineer with some managerial experience (with an MBA, if possible). Two engineers will be assigned to the project full time to perform most of the work. The first will be responsible for all R&D activities including the development of a prototype. The second will be responsible for the transition from development to production.

Both engineers will report to a senior project manager responsible for scheduling, budgeting and integration problems. The work breakdown structure will follow a similar line as shown below.
