Deep learning-based recommendation systems (e.g., DLRMs) are widely used AI models to provide high-quality personalized recommendations. Training data used for modern recommendation systems commonly includes categorical features taking on tens-of-millions of possible distinct values. These categorical tokens are typically assigned learned vector representations, that are stored in large embedding tables, on the order of 100s of GB. Storing and accessing these tables represent a substantial burden in commercial deployments.

Our work proposes MEM-REC, a novel alternative representation approach for embedding tables. MEM-REC leverages Bloom filters and hashing methods to encode categorical features using two cache-friendly embedding tables. The first table (token embedding) contains raw embeddings (i.e. learned vector representations), and the second table (weight embedding), which is much smaller, contains weights to scale these raw embeddings to provide better discriminative capability to each data point. We provide a detailed architecture, design and analysis of MEM-REC addressing trade-offs in accuracy and computation requirements, in comparison with state-of-the-art techniques. We show that MEM-REC can not only maintain the recommendation quality and significantly reduce the memory footprint for commercial scale recommendation models but can also improve the embedding latency. In particular, based on our results, MEM-REC compresses the MLPerf Criteria/B benchmark DLRM model size by 2900% and performs up to 3.4x faster embeddings while achieving the same AUC as that of the full uncompressed model.

1 INTRODUCTION

Personalized recommendation systems are at the heart of a wide range of applications, including online retail, content streaming, search engines, and social media. The accuracy of these models has a significant business and monetary impact [13], which has engendered a substantial amount of research interest in industry and academia on improving the performance of algorithms for recommender systems. The most accurate modern systems are typically based on large deep neural networks, which account for a significant use of computational resources in commercial settings. At Facebook, for example, up to 72% of AI inference cycles in production datacenters are devoted to recommender systems [20].

Deep learning recommendation models such as Facebook’s “DLRM” [24], are trained on a mix of both numeric (dense) and categorical (sparse) features. The categorical features can take on an extremely large number of possible values (easily in the hundreds of millions), which makes representing them a burdensome proposition. A typical design assigns each possible feature value a dense vector representation, called an “embedding.” The embeddings are stored
