

Practicing allowable, safe research

Keep your communities, families, and especially your Elders safe

Absolutely NO direct face-to-face research activities are permitted at this time

Physical distancing of 6ft is not a suitable alternative in the context of research. That means, you cannot sit with anyone you are not already self-isolating with – that is, no one outside of your immediate household.

If you are wondering what research activities might be safe to continue during this pause of face-to-face contact, consider the following:

Research activities that are safe to do / continue

	Meetings via phone, video chat, or other media channels -> as long as everybody remains in their own home		Interviews, focus groups, any information collection possible via phone or video chat -> as long as everybody remains in their own home
	Ask participants to share knowledge or document research-related activities via audio or video recordings, then send to you -> as long as they interact only with others already in self-isolation with them in the same house		Create versions of questionnaires, assessment tools, etc. that participants can fill out electronically and return via email or use free software like fillable PDF, Google Docs, Google survey, or SurveyMonkey
	Transcribe interviews / recordings (independently at home)		Work on archival resources or analyze existing data (independently at home)
	Write reports, articles, or newsletters to share electronically, and if co-writing, send these to collaborators using Google Docs or by email (independently from home)		Create videos/films/short docs with the footage and recordings you already have or are currently being sent remotely to share your findings with others (independently from home)

TIP: To exchange larger files, consider WeTransfer (for images or audio) or YouTube/Vimeo (for videos – set to 'private')
