

economy that sought to enrich the country by restraining imports and encouraging exports. (Library of economics and liberty)

The goal of these policies was, supposedly, to achieve a "favourable" balance of trade that would bring gold and silver into the country and also to maintain domestic employment. The mercantile system served the interests of merchants and producers such as the British East India Company, whose activities were protected or encouraged by the state.

The most important economic rationale for mercantilism in the sixteenth century was the consolidation of the regional power centres of the feudal era by large, competitive nation-states.

Enclosure Acts (1604 – 1914)– land publicly used for grazing . crops became the property of landlords – who then increased rent – pushing people toward the cities to earn a living

Other contributing factors were the establishment of colonies outside Europe;

the growth of European commerce and industry relative to agriculture;

the increase in the volume and breadth of trade; and the increase in the use of metallic monetary systems, particularly gold and silver, relative to barter transactions.

Growth of empire building (and military)

During the mercantilist period, military conflict between nation-states was both more frequent and more extensive than at any other time in history. The armies and navies of the main
