Modellmog,2000 Modellmog does not assume a sharp distinction between literary and legal institutions and practices but shows how writers imagined the two fields as engaged in the same cultural process He argues that because the law was instrumental in setting the terms by which concepts such as race gender nationhood ownership and citizenship were defined in the nineteenth century authors challenging those definitions had to engage the law on its own terrain to place their work in a dialogue with the law by telling stories that were already authorized though perhaps suppressed by legal institutions
