

KEY FACTS

- General practitioners (GPs) are uniquely placed to work within the biopsychosocial model.
- GPs manage a broad spectrum of mental health problems and mental disorders, as well as 'normal' reactions to a range of stressors and traumas.
- Approximately 1 in 5 adults in the general population suffers from an anxiety, mood or substance use disorder.
- Approximately 1 in 7 children and adolescents have mental health problems.
- In the community many people with a mental disorder do not seek or receive help.
- Most people with a mental disorder seek treatment from their GP; very few are seen by specialist mental health services.
- Approximately 25% of patients seen by GPs have a mental disorder.
- Between one quarter and half of all patients with a mental disorder who are seen by a GP are not diagnosed for that mental disorder.
- Five of the ten leading causes of disability worldwide are mental disorders.
- Comorbidity—either two mental disorders and/or a mix of physical illness and mental disorders—is very common.
- Screening is an effective means of improving detection rates.
- Referral for specialist care should be driven by patient need and the GP's skills, experience and confidence.

INTRODUCTION

GPs conduct more psychiatric consultations than any other group of health care providers. Furthermore, GPs deal with a broad range of consultations, ranging from people seeking help for acute problems to those with chronic and severe mental illness. In this chapter we provide an overview of the scope, content and practice of general practice psychiatry.

THE NEED FOR PRIMARY CARE PSYCHIATRY

There are a variety of factors driving the development of primary care psychiatry services (see Figure 1.1). First, epidemiological studies have made it clear that mental disorders are so common that most people who suffer from these disorders will need to be seen and cared for in primary care. This driver for the development of primary care psychiatry has been strengthened by studies demonstrating high levels of unmet need in the community. For example, the Australian National Survey¹ found that only 36% of those with a disorder were seen by any health service provider. Most who sought help consulted their GP.

Over the past two decades, the disability and cost of mental disorders, and thus the importance of reducing the level of unmet need, has become increasingly evident.
