

A Step-by-Step Approach to Pump Selection

Consider pipe sizing and motor power requirements before picking your pump.

Unless a brand new plant is being designed, users decide to replace a pump because of its age and wear or persistent reliability issues.

Plant engineers typically spend their time with the process to make sure machinery is working, water is flowing, power is produced, lights are up and no environmental problems are developing. They are not, as a rule, experts on any particular type of machinery.

They are basically generalists, having learned to rely on qualified suppliers, who are experts within their particular niche (pumps, centrifuges, boilers, generators, etc.). When a pump fails, it is usually replaced with a new one, without much analysis or discussion. If it continues to fail frequently, a new supplier is approached for a better, more reliable pump.

Occasionally, a relatively minor modification to the process, like an addition of a cooling (or heating) piping loop, for example, is needed. It may not be a particularly complex system, and hiring major design contractors may not be economical for such a small project. Yet, it might still be beyond the expertise of the plant engineers, maintenance and operating personnel.
