

Proceedings of the Third International Scientific Symposium on Tea and Human Health: Role of Flavonoids in the Diet

Introduction to the Proceedings of the Third International Scientific Symposium on Tea and Human Health: Role of Flavonoids in the Diet^{1,2}

Jeffrey Blumberg³

Jean Mayer U.S. Department of Agriculture Human Nutrition Research Center on Aging, Tufts University, Boston, MA 02111

The Third International Scientific Symposium on Tea and Human Health: Role of Flavonoids in the Diet was held September 23, 2002 at the U.S. Department of Agriculture in Washington, D.C. The symposium was organized by the Tea Council of the USA and cosponsored by the American Cancer Society, American College of Nutrition, American Health Foundation, American Society for Nutritional Sciences, Food and Agriculture Organization and the Linus Pauling Institute at Oregon State University. The symposium was cochaired by Martijn Katan (Wageningen University) and Jeffrey Blumberg (Tufts University). The first meeting in this series, Physiological and Pharmacological Effects of Camellia sinensis (Tea): Implications for Cardiovascular Disease, Cancer, and Public Health, was chaired by John Weisburger (American Health Foundation) and held at the Ford Foundation, New York, in 1991 (1). Dr. Weisburger also chaired the Second International Scientific Symposium on Tea and Human Health at the USDA in 1998 (2). The scientific publications indicating a role for tea in the promotion of health and prevention of disease have grown substantially during the last decade (Fig. 1) as have critical reviews of this topic (3–14). Indeed, the number of studies completed since 1998 suggested that it would be useful to again review the state-of-the-science regarding tea and health. Because most of this research has been directed toward the potential preventive and therapeutic roles of tea in cancer and heart disease, the leading causes of morbidity and mortality in most industrialized countries, this symposium focused principally on these two conditions while trying also to place tea as a whole food contributing substantially to dietary flavonoid intakes.

Health benefits have been attributed to tea consumption since the beginning of its history about 50 centuries ago. It is worth noting that the scientific investigation of the putative health effects of tea has emerged during a period of intensive research on the contribution of phytochemicals, particularly the polyphenolic flavonoids, to health (15,16). Flavonoids, including the catechins found predominantly in tea, have been associated with a wide range of biological activities, including antiangiogenic, antibacterial, anticarcinogenic, antiinflammatory, antithrombotic, antiviral, hypocholesterolemic, hypoglycemic and vasodilatory effects (17). Whereas some of these actions are almost certainly mediated partly by the radical scavenging and mineral complexing antioxidant actions of tea polyphenols, many other potential mechanisms of action have been characterized, including their binding carcinogens, inducing Phase I and II enzymes and inhibiting heterocyclic amine formation (18). Molecular mechanisms, including catechin-mediated induction of apoptosis and cell cycle arrest, inhibition of transcription factors NF- κ B and AP-1 and reduction of protein tyrosine kinase activity and c-jun mRNA expression, have also been suggested as relevant chemopreventive pathways for tea (19). Although it is reasonable to focus on the bioactivity of catechins from tea, as is the case in this symposium, it is important to appreciate the complex phytochemical composition of the beverage that includes other polyphenols, amino acids, caffeine, carbohydrates, chlorophyll, fluoride, minerals, protein and still undefined compounds (20). Indeed, the recent report by Kamath et al. (21) suggests that ethylamine and its precursor L-theanine, not catechins, are the constituents in tea responsible for priming human γ BT cells to promote natural resistance to microbial infections and perhaps tumors.

The implication that tea may reduce the risk for cancer and cardiovascular disease is significant with their estimated impact directly on medical costs and indirectly through productivity losses estimated at $157 and $352 billion per annum, respectively, in the United States alone. However, despite the focus on these diseases here, intriguing recent evidence suggests that tea may also play a beneficial role in other conditions, including dental caries (22,23), osteoporosis (24,25), cognitive function (26) and weight maintenance (27).

One challenge in interpreting the observational evidence concerning tea and health is appreciating the diversity of this beverage. For example, the relative catechin content of tea is dependent upon how the leaves are processed prior to drying as well as geographic location and growing conditions. The ¹ Presented as part of "The Third International Scientific Symposium on Tea and Human Health: Role of Flavonoids in the Diet," given at the United States Department of Agriculture, September 23, 2002. This conference was sponsored by the American Cancer Society, American College of Nutrition, American Health Foundation, American Society for Nutritional Sciences, Food and Agriculture Organization, and the Linus Pauling Institute at Oregon State University and was supported by a grant from the Tea Council of the U.S.A. Guest editor for this symposium was Jeffrey Blumberg, PhD, Jean Mayer USDA Human Nutrition Research Center on Aging, Tufts University, Boston, MA 02111.
