RAILS WEST

by GEORGE B. ABDILL

Completes Great Three-Volume
Pageant of Railroad History

The past century saw steam locomotives and brave little trains conquer the frontier and become a powerful influence in every American's life. Then the railroad age suddenly faded out to leave only memories and misty eyes.

In his three splendid books, George Abdill has caught the pioneer spirit and presents the finest, most comprehensive collection of early steam railroads ever put between book covers. Coupled to this vast dramatic show are human interest tales of the men who sought adventure and became legends in the push of steam and steel.

The first volume, "This Was Railroading", published in 1958, covered tracks, trains and troubles in Northern California and the Pacific Northwest. Spectacular photographs of mainline, short line and feeder railroads are supported by stories of record runs, wrecks, floods and anecdotes of many a doughty engineer and fireman.

WYOMING INTERLUDE (on the front of the jacket) is recorded in this early view of a station on the Union Pacific's main line, with Engine 25 dominant in the foreground. The flavor of railroading in the Far West is captured by the spreading rack of elk horns atop old 25's oil headlight, the mascot dog seated on the tank tool box, and the slouch-hatted youth near the gangway, clutching what appears to be his trusty Henry repeating rifle. The runner, shirt sleeves rolled up to expose his long-handled underwear, sports a watch chain of hawser dimensions looped at his waist as he nonchalantly leans against the guide bars, oil can in hand. Engine 25 was built by Schenectady in 1868, two years before she posed for this portrait. She had 16 x 24 inch cylinders, 63 inch drivers, and weighed 68,600 pounds. She was later renumbered Union Pacific 580 and was scrapped in 1895. The old girl was burning wood when this plate was exposed with the board and batten depot serving as a background.
