

Optimal Rangeland Management for Sustainable Livestock Farming

Franci P. Jordaan

Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, Potchefstroom, South Africa

Abstract: Rangeland is often described as the farmer's cheapest fodder source. Although there is inherently nothing wrong with this statement, it is only true if the rangeland is in a good condition. To obtain a rangeland that is in good condition it is necessary to practice optimal rangeland management. With optimal rangeland management an endeavor is made to maintain the long-term productivity of the rangeland, while the yield of animal products such as wool, meat and/or milk are maximized. To achieve optimal rangeland management factors like stocking rate and management systems are important, but the most important factor is healthy, perennial grass plants with excellent root systems. For a farmer to achieve optimal rangeland management it is thus necessary to look after the root systems of the grass plants and this can be achieved through proper rest systems in the rangeland.

Key words: management systems, stocking rate, rangeland rest, plant growth

1. Introduction

Rangelands collectively represent about 75% of the world's land surface [1, 2] and are home to 2.1 billion people — approximately 35% of the world's population [1]. In spite of the fact that the rangelands of the world is often described as degraded [3, 4] one often hear the following statements: "The most valuable asset in livestock farming is rangeland" or "Natural grazing (rangeland) is the cheapest way meat is produced" and the most common one "Rangeland is the farmer's cheapest fodder source" [5-7]. When the last statement is typed into Google, there are over 30 000 written results where this statement has already been used. Although there is inherently nothing wrong with any of these statements, all can be considered as incomplete. Rangeland is only a cheap and good fodder source if it is in a good condition — rangeland in a good condition will lead to climate smart livestock productions where enteric emissions are relatively low [7]. Rangeland management is one of the most difficult aspects of farming. Poor rangeland management often leads to poor, unproductive rangeland which negatively affects farming efficiency and in the end leads to higher enteric emissions from ruminant livestock [7]. To achieve good rangeland management, it is essential that not only the stocking rate should be closely monitored, but sound management principles, especially aimed at the grass plant/roots, should also apply. To achieve the latter, it is important that the growth and development of the grass plant, but especially the health of the grass roots, are taken into account [5, 6].

2. Optimal Rangeland Management

The main purpose of optimal rangeland management is to maintain the long-term productivity of the rangeland, while the yield of animal products such as wool, meat and/or milk are maximized. From a practical point of view, the functions of optimal rangeland management is to maintain a consistent supply of feed for the animals, but at the same time

Herrera, Jonathan Davies, Pablo Manzano Baena, 2014-10-10 Rangelands are large natural landscapes that can include grasslands shrublands savannahs and woodlands They are greatly influenced by and often dependent on the action of herbivores In the majority of rangelands the dominant herbivores are found in domestic herds that are managed by mobile pastoralists Most pastoralists manage their rangelands communally benefitting from the greater flexibility and seasonal resource access that common property regimes can offer As this book shows this creates a major challenge for governance and institutions This work improves our understanding of the importance of governance how it can be strengthened and the principles that underpin good
