provides flexibility in the design and use of such typologies to address specific questions and avoids the great challenge of dealing with multidimensionality with many variables Our case study of the opposition between small scale versus large scale planted forests which is a prominent distinction supposed to inform on impacts actually shows confusion between scale and ownership as discriminative variables In addition this classic opposition fails to acknowledge the contrasting contexts as illustrated by case studies in Australia and Indonesia where small and large mean and imply very different things There remains a need for both a universally recognized typology produced by consensus to enable the release of statistics and fruitful debates and purpose oriented typologies produced by stakeholders in given contexts to inform specific policies
