A. Harper, 2016-06-30 Excerpt from Sexual Reproduction and the Organization of the Nucleus in Certain Mildews Objections which are still urged by the opponents of De Bary s views are rather in the nature of complaints and denials than in the presentation of new facts A most fertile source of confusion in the discussion of the relationships of fruit forms in the fungi has been the failure to make all comparisons from the standpoint of a strictly phylogenetic morphology Whatever excuse there may be for introducing physiological conceptions into the formal classification of tissues in the higher plants there can be no question that great confusion has arisen in the morphology of the fungi and algae from allowing considerations of functional equivalence or difference to mingle with and modify the conceptions of what should be a strictly phylogenetic morphology It may be a hopeless task it certainly is not at present a very important or stimulating one to attempt to determine with exactness lines of phylogenetic descent among such plastic forms as the algae and fungi but no other or lesser aim than this should be allowed to masquerade under the guise of morphology Physiological data as to the functions and mechanics of cells and organisms are of far greater biological significance than those of phylogenetic morphology but this is no reason for mixing the two or allowing such attempts as we may make at the arrangement of plant forms in evolutionary series to be vitiated by the introduction of purely functional criteria into the determination of our morphological classifications The question for example whether a given organ is functional in its more primitive or in some modified fashion can have no bearing upon the determination of its morphological nature or relationships Comparisons must frequently be made and hypothetical morphological categories established on data which are incomplete and can perhaps never be made complete but a lack of data as to phylogenetic relationship can never be compensated for by evidence of functional equivalence or non equivalence The modern fields of causal and experimental morphology developmental mechanics etc belong with the physiological rather than the morphological disciplines and their results have the same bearing upon the classifications of phylogenetic morphology as have other physiological data If there can be agreement that the various developmental stages and fruit forms of the fungi and algae shall be classified and named in accordance with what can be determined as to their phylogeny a number of disputed questions will disappear About the Publisher Forgotten Books
