

CHAPTER 10 COST ALLOCATION AND ACTIVITY-BASED COSTING

CHAPTER INTRODUCTION

Companies that produce more than one product or provide more than one type of service frequently incur fixed and some variable overheads and attempt to allocate or allocate them to departments that use those resources or shared resources. For example, the tool design and design department departments may share a high-speed tool machine or several machines that are shared among all departments. Therefore, overhead costs associated with shared resources should be properly allocated to products or services. Overhead costs are allocated to departments that use those resources. This process of allocating overheads is referred to as cost allocation.

Objectives, Issues, and Discussion

LO1 Explain why indirect costs are allocated, describe the cost allocation process, and explain allocation methods: department costs.

PLANNING AND COST ALLOCATION

Companies allocate indirect costs to products, services, or departments that use those resources:

- To provide information about indirect costs to management.
- To provide cost information to customers.
- To allocate overheads to products that use those resources.
- To allocate the full cost of products, by allocating overheads and the remaining cost-based costs.

To Provide Information for Decision Making... When managers use a company's resources and incur indirect costs, they use, for example, electricity or energy for the use of the company's resources. When managers use the company's resources, they incur indirect costs. These indirect costs are allocated to the departments that use those resources. When a department, such as design, uses indirect costs, the department's cost of using the company's resources is increased. When a department, such as design, uses indirect costs, the department's cost of using the company's resources is increased. When a department, such as design, uses indirect costs, the department's cost of using the company's resources is increased. When a department, such as design, uses indirect costs, the department's cost of using the company's resources is increased.

To Allocate Indirect Costs to Departmental Resources...
