

Sierra Nevada Climate Change Refugia

Giant Sequoia

This long-lived species has persisted through previous climatic change; groves may serve as an indicator of hydrologic or fire refugia for other species.

Snow

Snow refugia sustain late season snow and function as a natural water storage system. Snowmelt released into streams and stored as groundwater in meadows helps offset dry summers.

Alpine Communities

Alpine community refugia maintain cold temperatures and snowpack longer, and may foster persistence of pika, bighorn sheep, rosy-finch, whitebark pine, and endemic plants.

Fire

Fire refugia more closely resemble the fire regime that existed prior to modern-day climate change, allowing persistence of fire-dependent species and communities, and/or their timely return post-fire.

Old Growth Forests

Mature forest refugia with a complex mix of large conifer and hardwood trees provide carbon sequestration, canopy cover, and cool microclimates for species like Pacific fisher and California spotted owl.

Meadows

Montane meadow refugia affect critical hydrologic functions including groundwater storage and run-off, and offer habitat for sensitive species like willow flycatcher, great gray owl, and Yosemite toad.
