The privatization of land use controls in the UK?

M.G. Lloyd

The present system of land use planning controls in the UK has attempted to control the use and development of land in the wider social interest. However, with increasing government intervention and regulation, the system represents a significant restriction on the exercise of private rights in land. The present Conservative government has recently questioned the rationale, extent and effects of these regulatory land use controls. As an alternative, the government has proposed a new initiative of 'simplified planning zones'. This article examines the concept of SPZs in the UK, and identifies some likely implications for the wider social interest in land use and property development.

M.G. Lloyd can be contacted at the Department of Land Economy, University of Aberdeen, Edward Wright Building, Old Aberdeen AB9 2TY, Scotland.

Town and country planning has been, until recently, a generally accepted feature of the post-war welfare state in the UK. It has attempted to control the use and development of land in the wider social interest. From the early part of this century, and certainly throughout the post-war period, the development of land use controls has involved increasing government intervention and regulation over the use and development of private land.¹ As a consequence, there is at present an extensive and comprehensive system of land use planning controls, which represents a significant restriction on the exercise of private rights in land. The administration of the land use planning system is achieved by the complementary instruments of development plans and development control. Both are the responsibility of local government, which acts within the general context of central government policy advice and guidance. Development plans provide the forward planning context to the anticipated development of land and property within the jurisdiction of a local authority, and establish the framework to the control over any subsequent proposed private sector development. In general terms, local authorities will licence development where the proposal conforms to the development plan and is thus considered to be in the overall social interest.²

Throughout the post-war period there has been a general consensus of support for the statutory land use planning system. The present Conservative government has, however, questioned the rationale, extent and effects of the existing framework of regulatory land use controls. This is clearly illustrated in its recent Housing and Planning Bill, which is essentially a response by the government to what it perceives as the basic weaknesses in the existing land use planning system. For example, it is held that the administration of planning controls by local authorities is inefficient. This, it is argued, leads to delays and as a consequence increased property development costs for the private sector.³ As an alternative to the bureaucracy of public sector
