

Welcome to Qualitative Research in Medicine & Healthcare

Mariaclena Bartesaghi

Department of Communication, University of South Florida, Tampa, FL, USA

On behalf of the authors, the reviewers, the editorial staff and our wonderful Editorial and Advisory Boards I extend a warm welcome to our first issue of Qualitative Research in Medicine and Healthcare (QRMH)! I am lucky to be working with so many great people, and dedicated to making this a great place to publish.

With many qualitative research journals already on the academic scene, and a good amount of these in the areas of health communication, healthcare, and medicine a new journal is a risky proposition. As our aims and scope promise, it is nonetheless a vital and crucial undertaking. As the articles in this first issue demonstrate, QRMH is true to its promise of interdisciplinarity; four of its five pieces are collaborations by scholars and practitioners in medicine, nursing, communication, biology, theology, international affairs and conflict resolution. And all of the articles raise complex queries, tell difficult stories or ask the complex and uncomfortable questions for which qualitative research is best equipped.

As many of you already know, qualitative research is not for the faint of heart. It is reflexive, positioned and like life itself, often messy and focused not on producing easy answers but on the very process of questioning. It is, at best, acutely aware of its ontological consequentiality. Unlike research studies under positivist or post-positivist auspices, true qualitative research does not separate the observer from the lived experience of those whom she observes.

Rather, it is by understanding the ways in which our own research practices bring forth the very world in which we live that qualitative researchers have a stake in understanding the very reflexive dynamics of how we constitute the world makes us.

Consider the traditional process of knowledge construction in medicine and healthcare and how, in these very social and human sciences, we unproblematically take notions of scientific evidence as detached from the very measurements, screenings, and processes of lived experience in which knowledge-making is situated. Data, findings, reports are always written in the third person omniscient language of science, concealing writers, bodies, lives. We try to fit ourselves into the spaces offered by questionnaires, rather than finding questionnaires designed to fit us.

Though evidence-based has become a popular phrase, for example, it works by pronominal omission; and yet it is always evidence for someone, by someone, and in a particular context with very real and life changing consequences. By the same token, that of patient (including the popular patient-centered), disadvantage, vulnerable, and so on are constructs – that is, categories that create the very situations they purport to describe. By way of our research findings and discussions, these categories can either re-enter the world as natural, or we may use research as a process in which to examine the social dynamics of what it means for these terms to categorize and create what Wittgenstein called forms of life, that is, to describe, as well as prescribe conditions of our very being and courses of action that implicate courses of actions, policies, social change.

As Erin Castellote tells us in an intensely personal and beautifully written opening article (and the second part to this first one is already in the works!) she is a woman at a crossroads, facing important decisions as to how to (re)construct her career and personal life. Metaphorically, working in healthcare is a matter of always being at a crossroads. Medicine, she writes, is practiced by imperfect human beings, most of whom are dangerously overworked.

The stories that enrage me are those in which doctors dismiss people's concerns without a complete assessment: the man without insurance who is obviously having a heart attack but is discharged from urgent care

Criminal Justice and the Social Sciences Connie Ireland, Bruce Lawrence Berg, Robert J. Mutchnick, 2010 Research Methods for Criminal Justice and the Social Sciences combines a traditional research book with exercises that allow students to experience research in a controlled environment. It is a companion methods manual for use with most traditional social scientific research textbooks. This book offers readers basic information about methodological concerns, brief readings, and a variety of practices/exercises relating to those readings. Some features of this book: Each chapter begins with a BRIEF discussion of the elements relevant to a basic understanding of research methods. After each section of each chapter are several abstracted reprints containing basic intros of published articles. Each reading is then followed with an Application Exercise which relates to the methodological procedure in the abstracted reprint. All exercises were designed to be completed by college students and allows them to get their hands dirty with the.
