- How Problems Occur
- How to Prepare for a Flood
- During the Flood
- After the Flood
- Reduce System Stress

The most common septic systems used in the United States employ soil treatment area to treat and disperse wastewater into the environment (see Figure 1). The soil treatment area consists of a network of perforated pipes within gravel-filled trenches. Under normal environmental conditions, well designed and managed septic systems work very well at dispersing wastewater and removing pathogens from the wastewater before they reach groundwater or surface waters.

Kentucky's large precipitation events occasionally flood residential areas that rely on septic systems. A flooded private sewage system can be hazardous for homeowners until saturated soils return to their normal state. Flooding risks include sewage backing up in the home, contaminated drinking water, and lack of sanitation. The purpose of this publication is to explain how homeowners can prepare for high-water problems and respond appropriately to septic system flooding.

How Problems Occur

When there is flooding, or when soils are saturated for extended periods of time, septic systems cannot function properly. Proper septic system performance relies on the soil's ability to treat and disperse wastewater. Under normal conditions, soils are aerobic so they can properly treat wastewater by

Figure 1. This top view of a conventional trench septic system shows that it uses a series of trenches (each about 2 feet deep) to distribute wastewater into aerobic (with oxygen) soil for treatment before it reaches groundwater. (Shannon Katz)
