ABSTRACT

Cultural and social changes around the world are making it increasingly important to adequately prepare prospective teachers for teaching learners from diverse backgrounds and coping with constant changes in learning. It is becoming more complicated to teach every subject; knowledge in every subject area is growing; classroom complexity is increasing; the world's population is growing and becoming more mobile than ever before; family structures are changing; mass communication is changing; and modes of learning between adults and youths are becoming broader and more challenging; religion is increasing; ideological conflicts have intensified; cynicism and scepticism have greatly increased; and so has the importance of multicultural education. As a result of these changing conditions, teachers no longer know enough to deal with the ever-changing world of education. Preparing prospective teachers to teach in today's classrooms, therefore, requires a high level of awareness of these changes. Adapting to changes in learning and teaching techniques is a skill that teachers must cultivate. The purpose of this article is to demonstrate how culturally responsive teaching can facilitate effective learning and promote equity and social justice for learners from diverse ethnic, racial, and other minority groups. In addressing the issues raised here, the article drew on various perspectives of cultural responsiveness to characterise various research and theoretical assumptions that offer new insights and pedagogical directions for teachers, school administrators, policymakers, and other stakeholders in education.

Keywords: Teachers, culturally responsive education, learners, diverse race.

PREPARING TEACHERS FOR CULTURALLY RESPONSIVE EDUCATION IN A RAPIDLY CHANGING WORLD

Growing recognition of the rights of diverse racial, ethnic and other minoritised groups to equal access to education has led to multicultural education taking root in schools around the world. As a result, teachers and educational authorities are finding it more challenging to address various aspects of multicultural education such as race, ethnicity, gender and class diversity (Altbach, Reisberg and Rumbley, 2009; Dover, 2013; McDonald, 2005; UNESCO, 2012). Unlike in the past, today's classrooms in both developed and developing countries are rapidly evolving into culturally diverse classrooms. Restructuring school culture and strengthening equality in education, democratic values and social justice for diverse racial, ethnic, and other social groups are some of the challenges facing 21st century multicultural education (Alkenhead, 2017; Artiles, Klingner and Tate, 2006; Bhargava, Hawley, Scott, Stein and Phelps, 2004; UNICEF, 2012; Wane, 2009). The major challenge is not only that most teachers are not equipped with the humanistic and pedagogical skills needed for culturally
