

Posttraumatic Stress Disorder in DSM-5: New Criteria and Controversies

Mark W. Miller, Erika J. Wolf, and Terence M. Keane, National Center for PTSD at VA Boston Healthcare System, Boston University School of Medicine

The fifth edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5) (American Psychiatric Association, 2013) featured extensive changes to the post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) diagnosis. PTSD was moved out of the anxiety disorders into a new class of "trauma- and stressor-related disorders," and the definition of what constitutes a traumatic experience was revised. Three new symptoms were added, existing ones were modified, and a new four-cluster organization and diagnostic algorithm were introduced. Finally, a new dissociative subtype was added to the diagnosis. We review these changes, discuss some of the controversies surrounding them, and then introduce a new debate involving a radically different conceptualization of PTSD proposed for International Classification of Diseases, 11th edition.

Key words: dissociative subtype, DSM-5, ICD-11, posttraumatic stress disorder. [Clin Psychol Sci Prac 21(208-220), 2014.]

The definition of posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) in the fifth edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5) (American Psychiatric Association [APA], 2013) features the most extensive changes made to the diagnosis since its initial appearance in DSM-III (APA, 1980). These revisions were the product of a 5-year process led by a committee of experts in the field of traumatic stress. Their approach included systematic reviews of the literature, biweekly conference calls for discussion and debate, consultation with external advisors, early publication of proposed criteria, solicitation and review of feedback from the field, and psychometric studies designed to evaluate the impact of proposed changes (Friedman, 2013). In the end, changes to the PTSD diagnosis were extensive and included moving it out of the anxiety disorders section of the manual and into a new chapter titled "Trauma- and Stressor-related Disorders"; redefining what constitutes a traumatic event, including the elimination of the peri-traumatic emotion component from that definition; adding three new symptoms and revising existing ones; introducing a new four-cluster organization to the symptoms and diagnostic algorithm; and the creation of a new dissociative subtype (Friedman, Resick, Bryant, & Brewin, 2011; Friedman, Resick, Bryant, & Stein, et al., 2011). The aims of this article are to review and comment on these changes and the debate surrounding some of them, discuss initial studies that have evaluated these changes, and introduce a new controversy involving a radically different conceptualization of PTSD proposed for the International Classification of Diseases, 11th edition.

THE MOVE OF PTSD OUT OF THE ANXIETY DISORDERS INTO THE NEW "TRAUMA- AND STRESSOR-RELATED DISORDERS" CHAPTER

The most conceptually significant change to the PTSD diagnosis was its move out of the anxiety disorders and into a chapter in the DSM-5 meta-structure named victims of catastrophic life events the psychiatric consequence of the posttraumatic stress leading to a mental disorder if left untreated can be debilitating The prevalence of posttraumatic stress disorder PTSD in countries that have suffered war and political conflicts such as Northern Ireland Uganda and Palestine ranged between twenty to seventy percent Analysis of epidemiological surveys by the World Mental Health between 2012 until 2015 for non war related traumatic event reported 54% of lifetime prevalence in Europe 56 1% in Italy and 60 6% in Northern Ireland Given the potential economic and psychosocial impact of PTSD efforts to identify biomarkers of risk disease and treatment of PTSD is of significant public health importance The psychiatric codification of PTSD has made possible for patients to access medical care and treatment Likewise mental health professionals were able to predict reliably distinguish and diagnose trauma associated disorder from other major mental illness However the issue of whether PTSD owes its existence to environmental context individual differences and learning or whether it is entirely neurobiological determined has been debated fiercely Findings from the neuroimaging and translational research provide evidence that supports the neurobiological theories of etiology but yet to find a specific biomarker for PTSD In fact research outcome strongly suggest PTSD is a result of interaction between
