THE American capitalist system is based on ownership. It may be ownership of a house, a business organization, stocks in a corporation, or what-not. For most Americans, when given a choice of power, of control over one's destiny, through, in ownership of a business enterprise. From the beginning of the nation this desire for ownership has been a salient feature of the American character in life. However mythical the Horatio Alger legend may be, it clearly points up a belief which plays on the American's ambivalence. A few poor boys have moved to the city and did indeed become captains of industry. To the men they were like and the women, the most successful white businessmen were of New England or Northeastern birth, a Puritanism, and upper middle or upper class. The myth, however, gave hope to many Americans whose parents were could say, "If that man made it from so lowly a beginning, then I too, can do it." Even if success were not phenomenal, still the ownership of even a small or part-time owned business was achievement in many.

This need for power sought through business ownership permeates the whole American society and is not limited to white Americans. As a matter of fact, ownership may at this period hold even greater meaning for black Americans. Many would, however, strongly disagree with this statement; some because they would consider it inaccurate and others because it perpetuates a myth. E. Franklin Frazier clearly articulated the latter view about those in black hope of black Americans achieving liberation from their low economic position through business ownership. Frazier wrote us " . . . there have been ideas concerning the importance of Negro business have become a social myth and have this myth has been propagated
