

Hess, P. M., & Mullen, E. J. (Eds.). (1995). Practitioner-Researcher Partnerships: Building Knowledge From, in and for Practice. Washington, DC: National Association of Social Workers Press, 285 pp., $31.95 paper, ISBN 0-87101-252-9.

Practitioner-Researcher Partnerships examines the knowledge-building process based in large measure on "reflective inquiry" and practitioner-researcher collaborative work endeavors. Perhaps the major contribution of practitioner-researcher collaboration is recognition of the practitioner, in partnership with the researcher, as a knowledge builder.

Practitioner-researcher partnerships come in many different forms, but all address the same issue: the practice-research gap. The authors believe, and I agree, that practitioner-researcher collaboration is one way of addressing the practice-research gap.

Social work research has been in a crisis since 1874, when social workers walked out of the American Social Science Association claiming that their work required immediate attention and that there was little or no time for theoretical discussions (Frankel, 1926).

Lindsey and Kirk (1993) locate practice-research in a historical perspective. "The social work profession's historical and ideological bias . . . favors action over theory, practice insight over scientific research, and good intentions over effective outcomes; this has led to a de-emphasis on research" (p. 378).

In 1991, the National Institute of Mental Health issued a landmark report (Task Force on Social Work Research, 1991). A prior title of the report was The Crisis in Contemporary Social Work. David Austin, the director of the task force study, comments, "Within social work, research development is at a point of crisis. Research is not recognized as a significant part of the mission of the profession, either structurally or conceptually" (Austin, 1992, pp. 311-312). Can one call a chronic crisis an oxymoron?

In Practitioner-Researcher Partnerships, Hess and Mullen (1995) note, "The literature reveals few examples of effective practice-research collaborations in social work. Nor does it provide much in the way of helpful discussion about the issues, principles, and practice considerations that need to be pondered if such partnerships are to be realized" (p. ix).

Hess and Mullen (1995) believe that a major factor is the different conceptions of the nature of practice knowledge.

This book has examined a central reason for this underdevelopment—this bifurcation of the professional's practice and research communities. Underpin-
