Social Interaction and Well-being Across the Life Course Karen D. Lincoln,2002 This dissertation examines the relative contributions of positive and negative interaction with social networks for psychological well being among Black and white adults across the life course This dissertation follows the multiple manuscript format and employs data from the Americans Changing Lives Study ACL and the National Comorbidity Survey NCS Structural equation modeling is used to examine the interrelations between stress personal and social resources and psychological well being Specifically this dissertation examines 1 the relative contribution of positive and negative interaction for psychological well being while taking into account the influence of personality 2 personal control and mastery as mediators in the relationship between social interaction and psychological well being 3 the role of social interaction in the stress process and 4 positive and negative interaction as mediators of the impact of stress on psychological well being Findings indicated different models of these relationships for African Americans and whites Overall positive interaction was a stronger predictor of psychological well being for African Americans whereas negative interaction was a stronger predictor of psychological well being for whites Personal control and mastery were identified as important mediators in the relationship between negative interaction and psychological well being for African Americans whites and older adults Financial strain and traumatic events were associated with a decline in positive interaction for whites and older adults but not for African Americans Finally negative interaction contributed to the impact of financial strain and traumatic events on psychological well being for whites but not for African Americans or older adults Together these results provide a comprehensive model of the social support process and contribute to our understanding of the role of social networks in promoting well being Handbook of Clinical Psychology of Ageing Robert T.
