Practical Gods: Carl Dennis's Secularized Religious Visions

Hong Zeng

Department of English, Southwest Jiaotong University, Chengdu 611756, China; hongzeng8888@gmail.com

Abstract: This paper examines Carl Dennis's secularized religious visions in his Pulitzer-winning poetry collection, Practical Gods (2001). Dennis's secularized religious visions can be quite understandable in the context of the ascending trends of secularization, diversification, and globalization of religion in America, and they demonstrate affinities with literary predecessors such as Wallace Stevens, with his aestheticized religion under the influence of Nietzsche, as well as with the innovative religious thinking of William Blake, Kazantrakis, and Oscar Wilde, and with certain aspects of Taoism and Zen Buddhism. This paper addresses Dennis's perception of theological controversies, such as the contradiction between the omnipotence of God and the existence of evil, theological determinism vs. human free will, theological view of history vs. New Historicism, divinity in man, aestheticized religion, and earthly paradise through the focused lens of Dennis's "practical religion". Despite the breadth of the theses in Dennis's conceived practical religion as examined in this paper, they are all tied up with the core of the phenomenological study of religions: that religion is important to believers of the religion irrespective of the objective truth of the religion or the actual existence of God. In Dennis's views, as accorded with the phenomenological study of religions, God maybe an idea and a fiction, but it is a necessary fiction for humans. Thus, Dennis humanizes gods with the flaws and fragility of humanity while deifying ordinary humanity in the contemporary context. Contrasting what he views as theological determinism with its view of linear history and the apocalypse of grand events, Dennis embraces human free will, a non-teleological, aestheticized living with necessary fiction, and a transient paradise on earth. Carl Dennis's religious vision reveals a poststructuralist (even though he did not brand himself so) abolition of the absoluteness of a transcendent signifier as well as binary opposition (between God and man, good and evil, religious/historical truth and fictionality), and it manifests an affinity with New Historicism and the phenomenological study of religion.

1. Introduction

Carl Dennis's Practical Gods (2001) won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry in 2001. In this book, Dennis greatly rewrites and fictionalizes the original tenets of many schools of religions as he understands them. In other words, Practical Gods is an interaction between a poet's literary imagination and his subjective understanding of religions in rather "broad, general terms" rather than the more detailed, "meticulous" understanding of a religious scholar citing from religious texts. Being a contemporary poet, Dennis has rarely been studied beyond one or two book reviews, which do not deal with his religious visions at all. Biographical information about him and interviews with him are also quite scant; therefore, rather than speculating on the context of his writing, the paper focuses mainly on a close-text reading of his poetic work itself in the methodology of the school of New Criticism in addition to the methodology of the phenomenological and poststructuralist study of religion. Apart from citations from Dennis's poetry, this paper also cites from St. Augustine, Calvin, Darwin, Buddhist and Taoist texts, etc. I am very well aware that these citations present long-standing religious controversies, and I am not that naïve as to
