- Nursing considerations vary depending on the drug as well as the route of administration.
- Pharmacology is defined as the study or science of drugs.
- Any chemical that affects the physiologic processes of a living organism can broadly be defined as a drug.
- Throughout the process of its development, a drug will acquire at least three different names. The chemical name describes the chemical composition and molecular structure. The generic name, or nonproprietary name, is shorter and simpler. The trade name, or proprietary name, is the drug's registered trademark; commercial use is restricted to the owner of the patent.
- Prototypical drugs are the first drug in a class of drugs.
- The patent life of a newly discovered drug molecule is normally 17 years, approximately 10 years for research and development and 7 years for sales profit. After the patent expires, generic drugs with the same active ingredient may be produced.
- The study of the adverse effects of drugs and other chemicals on living systems is known as toxicology. Toxic effects are often an extension of a drug's therapeutic action.
- The study of natural drug sources (i.e., plants, animals, minerals) is called pharmacognosy.
- Pharmaco-economics focuses on the economic aspects of drug therapy.

Pharmaceutics

- Pharmaceutics is the science of dosage form design.
- Dosage form determines the rate at which drug dissolution and absorption occur.
