Phenomenon And Noumenon:

On the Distinction Between Phenomenon and Noumenon in the History of Philosophy Joseph Evans Sagebeer,1891

Time, Embodiment and the Self Andros Loizou,2017-11-22 This title was first published in 2000 Beginning with a sustained argument against the new tenseless theory of time and against McTaggart's A series B series distinction the author of this essay goes on to provide a non paradoxical tensed phenomenologically based account of the going on or taking place of events in time that escapes the paradoxes endemic to passage as understood via the A series B series distinction The author then turns his attention to the other main aim of the essay which is to seek an understanding of time adequate to those more embodied conceptions of the self that place character and with it the constitutive attachments or ground projects of individual life circumstance at the centre of the self This involves a redrawing of the self informed by a wider conception of the will than the one we have inherited via Descartes and Kant by an account of ground projects and by the theory of the tripartite psyche in Plato's Republic It also involves extending the account of time developed in the second chapter in a way that draws on the notion of ecstatic temporality that originates with Heidegger The essay will be of use to philosophers and advanced students interested in the nature of the self time temporality and phenomenology
