READING COMPREHENSION

review, timing strategies, and final thoughts

We have two Reading Comprehension lessons left. In this lesson, we will review the main points we have discussed in other Reading Comprehension lessons, walk through timing strategies, and talk about the work you'll be doing after this book. In the next lesson, we'll work on our final practice set of passages.

A Review of Lessons

Here is a snapshot review of the key points made in the various Reading Comprehension lessons. The lesson number has been listed after the point. You can use this list to reflect on what we've discussed and also to note areas in which it might help to do a bit of review.

The Reading Comprehension section tests your reading ability—primarily your ability to recognize reasoning structure (22).

The reasoning structure of a passage is the relationship between various parts of a passage; typically, the relationships in LSAT passages are structured around (often opposing) main points (22).

Reading Comprehension passages are not designed to test, in a significant way, your ability to retain a lot of information, your understanding of unusual subjects and words, or your critical reasoning ability (22).

It's helpful to think about all parts of a passage in terms of the following roles, all of which are defined by the main points made in the passage: main points, author's view of those points, reasons for and against those points, more information about those points as well as potential applications, and, finally, background on the subject matter related to those points (22).

Getting good at LSAT Reading Comprehension is less about developing new skills and more about correctly utilizing tools you already have (23).

As we read, we want to focus on reasoning structure more than subject matter, we want to embrace uncertainty when uncertainty is warranted, and we want to use main points to organize our thoughts (23).

The best time to most easily understand a passage is at the end of it, and for certain difficult passages, it will be nearly impossible to completely understand the passage before that point (23).

You are never required to be critical of reasoning as you read a passage, but one or two questions may ask for you to evaluate one of the opinions critically.
