ABSTRACT

Dietary acid load is a known and important risk factor for non-communicable diseases such as cancer. However, despite the link between cancer and acid load in the body, strategies related to this effect have not been properly investigated to reduce the risk of cancer. According to the Warburg Hypothesis, inadequate oxygen delivery to the tissues and an acidic cellular environment are the main causes of cancer. Hence, many cancers may be controlled by maintaining an optimal alkaline pH at the cellular level along with sufficient oxygenation and providing essential nutrients. An acid-forming diet may produce more acid than is excreted by the kidneys and lead to chronic acidosis and a significant increase in the risk of cancer. This unfavorable situation can be effectively managed by presence of sufficient alkaline compounds in the body and by neutralization of excess acids produced around the cells that can lead to the control of the growth and spread of cancer cells too. This review shows the correct and practical use of the Warburg hypothesis for more effective control of preventable cancers. considering Warburg hypothesis as a potential complementary strategy, it may help improve cancer treatment outcomes and increase survival rate.

Introduction

Cancer is still a worldwide major public health problem that has seriously affected the health, economy and the social development. Nutritional status was demonstrated to have association with certain cancers (1).

It is generally believed that reducing dietary acid load may lower the risk of developing cancers (2, 3). However, the related mechanisms and diet-based treatment strategies are unclear, mainly due to the high focus of cancer studies on diagnosis and medical treatments, with little attention paid to understanding the nutrition-related mechanisms involved in the prevention and control of cancers (4-6). The link between cancer and excess acid load in the body was first revealed by Otto Heinrich Warburg (1883-1970), a German medical scientists and Nobel Prize winner (7, 8). Warburg's most important discovery was that in a cellular environment that chronically lacks oxygen, cells gradually become cancerous and produce high levels of lactic acid that can acidify the cellular environment. The excess blood acidity due to lactic acidosis can further lead to a more extensive and aggressive cancer progression. When the cells are exposed to excess acidity, especially around tumors, they may become inflamed and mutate into new cancer cells (9-11).

According to the Warburg's theory of cancer, all
