

Rapid Assessment Process

James Beebe

Concordia University, Spokane, Washington, USA

bogus empowerment Letting people think they have control over outcomes and the power to act on their own judgments when they actually do not have this control or power; can be the unintended consequence of hyperbole about the democratic nature of a situation.

ethnography A descriptive study of an intact cultural or social group or an individual or individuals within the group, based primarily on participant observation and open-ended interviews; based on learning from people as opposed to studying people.

iterative process A process in which replications of a cycle produce results that approximate the desired result more and more closely. For rapid assessment, the process describes the cycle of data analysis and data collection, designed to produce a preliminary understanding of a situation from an insider's perspective.

participants Persons interviewed as part of the rapid assessment process. The term can be used interchangeably with "informants" or "respondents" when these terms are not modified with the words "individual" or "key." The term "subjects" is generally avoided.

rapid appraisal, rapid rural assessment, rapid rural appraisal (RRA), participatory rural appraisal (PRA) Different types of rapid qualitative research based on small multidisciplinary teams using semistructured interviews and direct observations to collect information in processes that can be completed in less than 6 weeks. As usually implemented, these approaches lack the methodological rigor of rapid assessment.

rapid assessment process (RAP), rapid assessment Intensive, team-based qualitative inquiry using triangulation, iterative data analysis, and additional data collection to quickly develop a preliminary understanding of a situation from the insider's perspective.

triangulation A term from navigation and physical surveying that describes an operation for determining a position by use of bearings from two known fixed points. Triangulation is used as a metaphor by social scientists for the use of data from different sources, the use of several different researchers, the use of multiple perspectives to interpret a single set of data, and the use of multiple methods to study a single problem.

The rapid assessment process allows a team of at least two researchers to develop a preliminary understanding of a complicated situation in which issues are not yet well defined, an insider's perspective is needed, and there is not sufficient time or other resources for long-term, traditional qualitative research. Rapid assessment is a type of participatory action research and shares many of the characteristics of ethnographic research. Rapid assessment, however, uses intensive, team interaction and multiple cycles of data collection followed by data review/analysis, instead of the prolonged fieldwork normally associated with traditional qualitative research. Results can be used for planning, monitoring, and evaluating activities and for the design of additional research. Rapid assessment will almost always produce results in a fraction of the time and at less cost than is required by traditional qualitative research.

Introduction

Rapid assessment is defined as intensive, team-based qualitative inquiry using triangulation, iterative data analysis, and additional data collection to quickly develop a preliminary understanding of a situation from the insider's perspective. Data are collected by talking with people and getting them to tell their stories. The acronym for the rapid assessment process, "RAP," expresses well the need to communicate with participants using their vocabulary and rhythm, in that one definition of "rap" is "to talk
