Forsythe, III, 1998-07 Is American Health Care Uniquely Inefficient? Alan M. Garber, Jonathan Skinner, 2008 The U S health system has been described as the most competitive heterogeneous inefficient fragmented and advanced system of care in the world In this paper we consider two questions First is the U S health care system productively efficient relative to other wealthy countries in the sense of producing better health for a given bundle of hospital beds physicians nurses and other factor inputs Second is the U S allocatively efficient relative to other countries in the sense of providing highly valued care to consumers For both questions the answer is most likely no Although no country can claim to have eliminated inefficiency the U S has fragmented care high administrative costs and stands out with regard to heterogeneity in treatment because of race income and geography The U S health care system is also more likely to pay for diagnostic tests treatments and other forms of care before effectiveness is established and with little consideration of the value they provide A number of proposed reforms that are designed to ameliorate shortcomings of the U S health care system such as quality improvement initiatives and coverage expansions are unlikely by themselves to reduce expenditures Addressing allocative inefficiency is a far more difficult task but central to controlling costs      Genetics, Newborn Screening, and Inborn Errors of Metabolism, An Issue of Clinics in Perinatology Patrick K.
